RMI Management offers 'manager development program' for those wishing to change careers

LAS VEGAS – If you have ever thought about changing careers, you may want to consider becoming a certified community manager. RMI Management, LLC (RMI) is the largest community association management company in Southern Nevada and is currently accepting applicants for its manager development program.

The manager development program is a series of classes and hands-on training in financial management, property and facility management, specific duties relating to the management of common-interest communities, governance of an association and preparation of association-related reports and correspondence.

“As RMI expands, we are continually looking for community managers,” said Kevin Wallace, president and CEO of RMI. “And this is a great opportunity for people looking to make a career change.”

The program also includes job shadowing, in which participants work with current community managers.

The material covered in the program is intended to enable participants to pass the state licensing requirements in order to become certified community managers.

Applications are currently being accepted and interviews will begin in July. Those accepted into the program are required to attend all classes and take the state licensing exam. Additionally, program participation includes a one-year commitment to RMI.
